Grace runs a small Appalachian style quilting business alongside her legal work. She learned the craft from her grandmother starting at age seven, and the quiet, repetitive work is how she settles a mind full of legal arguments. The business is modest but real, with its own records and tax identification number.

Notes on the Year

The business produces fifteen to twenty pieces a year, ranging from small table runners to full bed quilts, priced from forty dollars to two thousand depending on size and detail. Materials are sourced from a quilt supply shop, and finished pieces sell at regional craft fairs and through an online makers collective.

The largest active project this year is a memorial quilt commissioned by a folk art museum, valued at eighteen hundred dollars and due later in the year. It is the most significant piece Grace has taken on and ties the craft she learned at her grandmother's table to a public collection.
