Nordstrom Forlag, October 2026

at Umea University and completed the writing programme at Biskops-Arno. Her short fiction has appeared in Ord and Bild and Karavan. Vinterspar is her first novel. She lives in Stockholm.

Elin Forsell is 32 and has spent most of her adult life making a conscious effort not to think about where she came from. When her grandmother dies and leaves her a house outside Umea, she has no good reason to go north and no good reason to refuse. She goes anyway.

What she finds in the house is not what she expected. Behind the everyday objects of a long life, a hidden correspondence stretching over four decades. Letters that do not belong to the story she has always been told about her family. Letters that change things.

Vinterspar moves between northern Sweden in the 1970s and the present day with quiet assurance. Lindstrom is not a writer who announces her effects. The prose is plain and exact and it accumulates in ways the reader only notices after the fact. This is a first novel written with the patience of someone who has been thinking about it for a long time.

A debut of rare discipline. The kind of writing that stays with you past the last page.

The Weight of Frozen Ground

by Erik Soderstrom

The third novel in Soderstrom's Norrland sequence follows Elsa Nordin back to the village she left at eighteen. A book about guilt, about what we owe the places that made us, and about what happens when returning is no longer a choice. Soderstrom writes with the same spare authority that made his previous two novels essential reading.

The Cartographer's Son

by Lena Bjork Olofsson

Set during the 18th-century Swedish mapping expeditions into Lapland, this novel follows a young assistant on a surveying mission that brings him face to face with Sami resistance to the colonial logic of measurement. Bjork Olofsson spent three years in the archive before writing a single page. The research shows, and it never gets in the way.

Nights We Did Not Sleep

by Thomas Vik, translated from Norwegian by Anna Lindqvist

Originally published in Norway in autumn 2025, where it was one of the most discussed novels of the year. A woman in her fifties sits with her dying mother in a hospital room and turns over the choices that shaped her life. Vik writes about grief without sentimentality and without false comfort.
